

Temperature-checking the profession for 2024, new year wishes, and what colour should exercise books be?

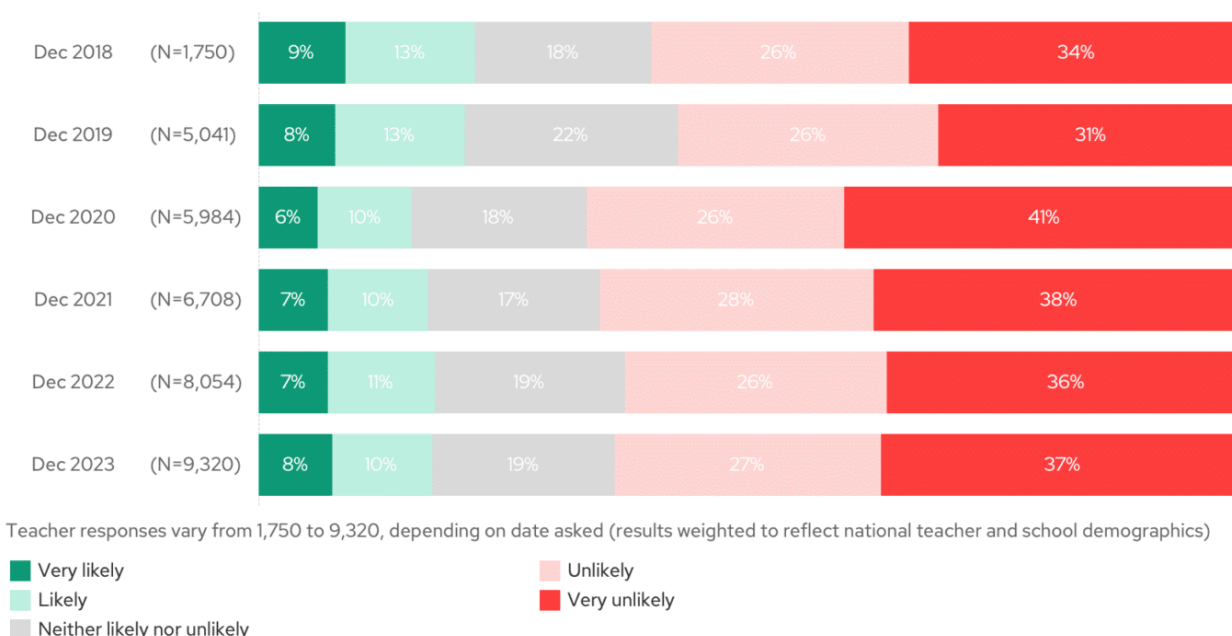

Happy New Year Tappsters! 2024 is set to be an exciting year at Teacher Tapp, keep your eyes peeled for new features and a new experiment on the app in the coming weeks 📱

BUT, before you are too firmly back in the habit of writing the date on the board each day, we wanted to look at some of the Teacher Tapp questions you answered in the 'betwixtmas' period where no one knew what day it was (but thank goodness for a 3:30 notification from Teacher Tapp 📱)

Temperature-checking the profession for 2024

Apparently, 75% of UK workers will be job hunting this January... Does that include teachers? We check on this each year between Christmas and New Year and results show that just under 1 in 5 of you will be job hunting (or retiring) in the coming year, roughly the same proportion as in recent years.

How likely is it that you will leave your school at the end of this academic year?

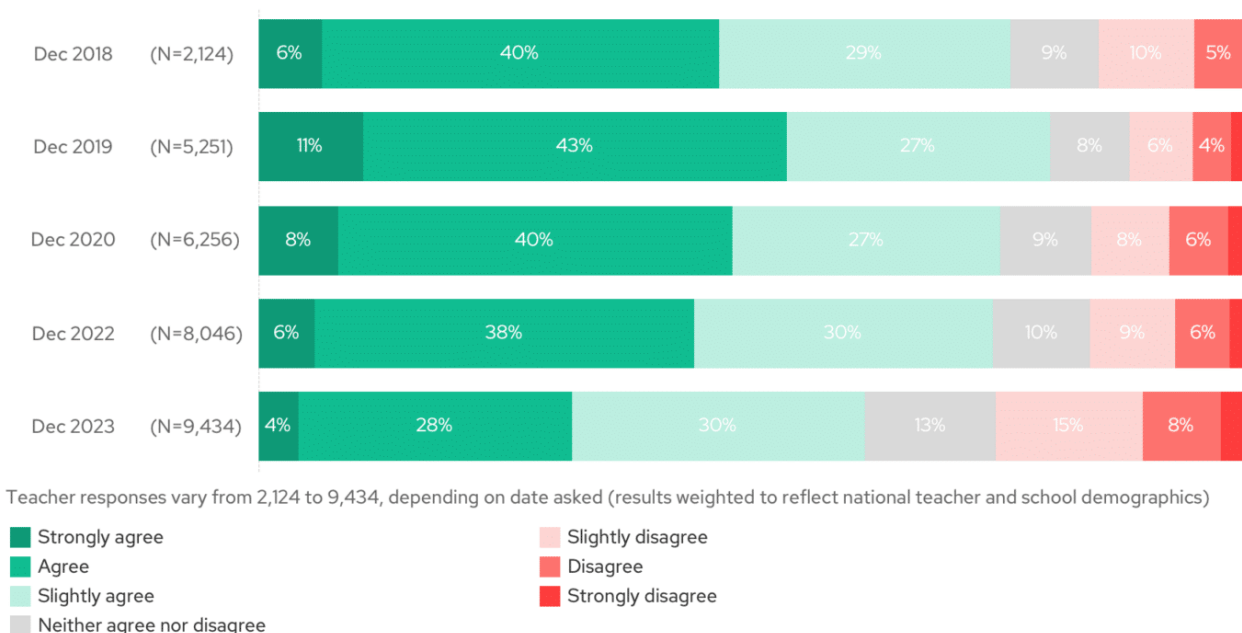

How about morale? Is that higher or lower than last year? After a covid-slump, it seems things are starting to look up a bit. 28% of you said morale is higher than a year ago... the highest it's been since 2019.

Do you feel that your morale is higher or lower than it was a year ago?

But before you get too excited that everything's looking rosy, our third end-of-year temperature check shows a more worrying trend... Fewer of you agree that 'conditions in your life' are 'excellent' than at any previous point in the past five years. And yes, that's even including the covid years ■■

The conditions of my life are excellent

Message to the Minister

So with that in mind, what are some of the things that you think could improve the profession in 2024?

It'll be no surprise that if a teacher were made education secretary, funding would be at the top of the priority list (as it has been since we started asking in 2018). Teacher recruitment also remains a priority. However, one change from 2018 is prioritising SEND moves up to third place.

If you were the education secretary, what would be your top priority this year? (You can only pick one)

Teacher responses vary from 1,364 to 9,441, depending on date asked (results weighted to reflect national teacher and school demographics)

Whilst improving children's behaviour might not be directly within the gift of the education secretary (although we might like to see her try ■■■), this is certainly another item high on teachers' wish lists... Up a little from 2021 and in-line with pre-pandemic 2019.

If you could wave a magic wand and change just one thing about teaching, which of the following would you choose?

Teacher responses vary from 5,168 to 9,441, depending on date asked (results weighted to reflect national teacher and school demographics)

On a lighter note...

Lots of you wrote to us last year suggesting we check on what colour exercise books "should" be for different subjects. It turns out that the results were pretty conclusive:

- English books should be yellow;
- Maths books should be blue; and
- Science books should be green!

If you could only have one colour of exercise book for all your students, the most popular choice was blue (closely followed by purple). The questions (let alone the answers!) also set off a good Twitter debate.

Ups and Downs

On the rise

- Getting too many emails at work: 23% of teachers say they get 'far too many' (compared to 20% in December 2020)
- Dealing with pupils with extremely disruptive behaviour outside of lessons: 39% of teachers feel this is worse compared to three years ago (compared to 32% in 2022)
- Dealing with pupils with extremely disruptive behaviour in lessons: 35% of teachers feel this is worse compared to three years ago (compared to 27% in 2022)

Heading down

- GCSE reliability: 24% of teachers say the exams are a 'not particularly accurate' measure of pupil attainment (was 19% in February 2021)
- Influence over what is taught in your classroom: 26% of teachers say they have 'a great deal of influence' (was 41% in January 2023)
