

Your views on whether curriculum reform is needed and switching schools!

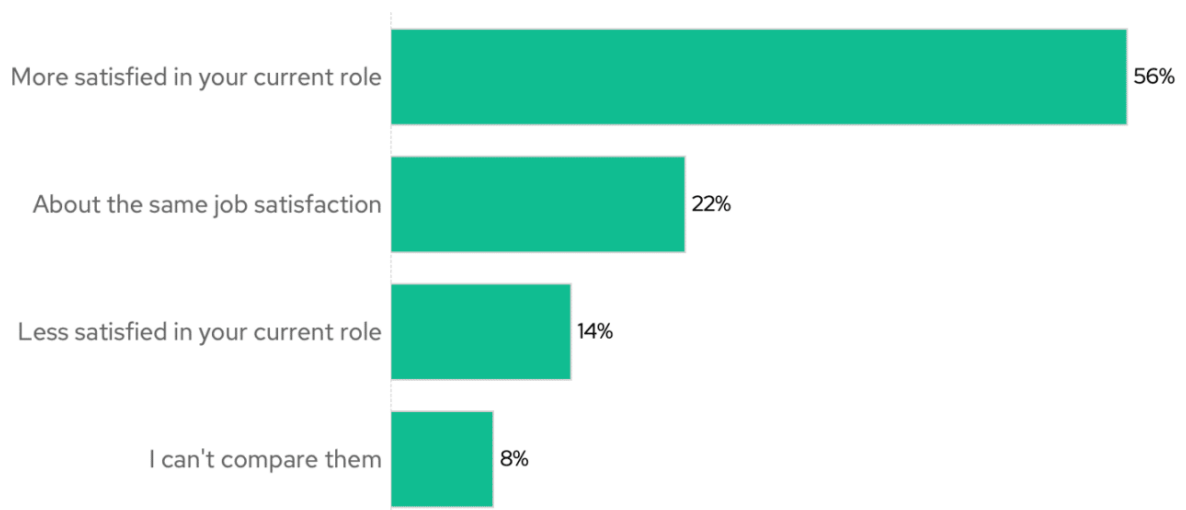

Is it worth trying a new school?

In a world where we don't have enough teachers, one thing we're keen to figure out is how we can keep more of you! So what would happen if every time a world-weary teacher said they were going to leave, they were asked: "Why don't you try a different school instead?"

To check if moving helps, we asked whether you're more or less satisfied in your current role compared to your previous one.

Of those who had more than one job, just 14% were less satisfied now versus 56% who are more satisfied. So, it seems that moving roles works out well for most teachers.

Comparing your current teaching role to your previous teaching role are you:

Question answered by 7,843 teachers on 20/01/2024 (results weighted to reflect national teacher and school demographics)

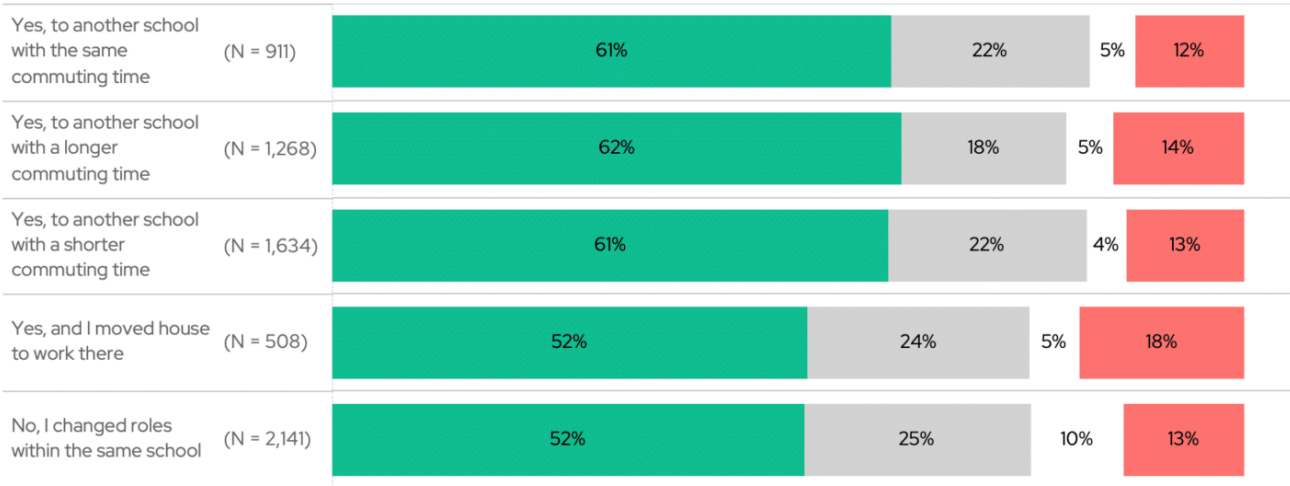

But wait, how do we know they definitely moved schools to get this new role? We asked!

You told us whether you changed schools (and/or houses) to take your latest role. And we found...

The most successful moves are for those moving to a new post in a new school within an area they already live. These teachers often have an advantage of knowing whether it is a good school to work at through local word of mouth. (Note: there's a slightly higher chance you won't be happy if the commute is longer for the new job, but it's a small chance).

Of those who moved jobs and moved house (so went to another area), only 52% were happier, which suggests it's more of a toss up. Why could this be? Well, it's possible a family house move required those teachers to leave a job they were actually very happy in, and they then had to take a new role somewhere, even if the school wasn't a perfect fit for them.

Questions asked: Did you move schools to get your current teaching role? (down) versus Comparing your current teaching role to your previous teaching role are you: (across)

Question answered by 6,462 teachers on 25/01/2024 (results weighted to reflect national teacher and school demographics)

More satisfied in your current role I can't compare them
About the same job satisfaction Less satisfied in your current role

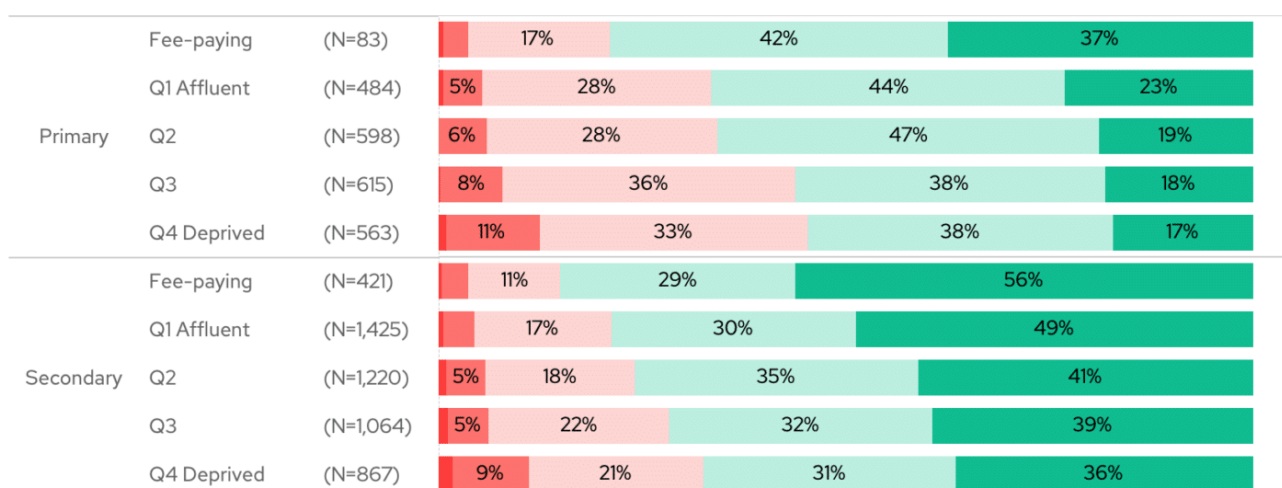

Helping us learn what curriculum reform is needed

The Labour party is very keen on curriculum reform. They say they're going to do a big review if they get elected. But what sort of curriculum reform is desired?

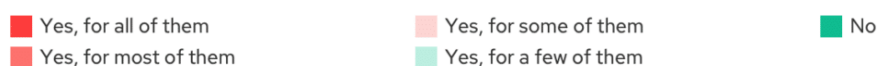

Last week we asked you to think of one class and whether the curriculum was too hard for them. Primary teachers stood out as being much more likely to say the curriculum was too difficult for their class.

Not surprisingly, there was a social dimension, with those teaching in poorer areas also the most likely to feel the curriculum is beyond the reach of many students.

Think of the first class you taught today (or yesterday). Is the curriculum too difficult for them?

Question answered by teachers on 23/01/2024 (results weighted to reflect national teacher and school demographics)

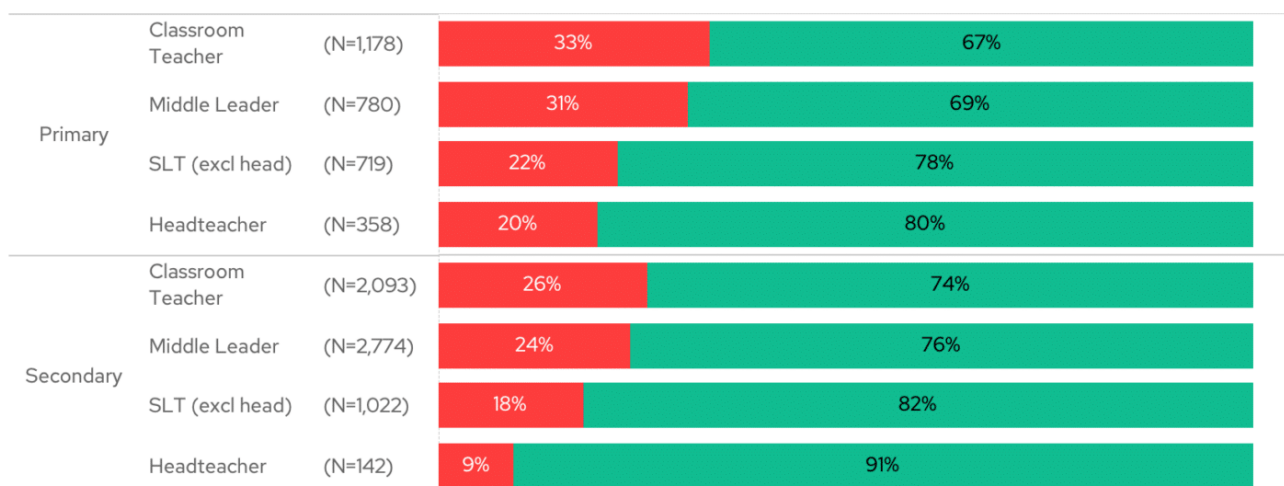

In the pursuit of high expectations, we may say this is a good thing. Children should be spending time on difficult things! But it becomes a problem if the curriculum is so packed that teachers are unable to spend sufficient time ensuring students have mastered essential curriculum elements, such as reading fluently and developing mathematical understanding.

For the forthcoming General Election we want to dig more into what changes teachers would like to make to education policy. As part of this, we'll be asking primary teachers whether they would like anything removed from the National Curriculum.

To help us write these questions, we asked an open-ended question: If you could remove one topic area from the KS2 National Curriculum in ANY subject, what would it be? We'll be analysing the responses fully in coming weeks but, for now, here is a flavour of the kind of things that were mentioned:

In the past month, have you ignored a pupil's behaviour rather than escalate it because you know you'll get kick back from the pupil's parents (personally or via social media)?

Question answered by teachers on 27/01/2024 (results weighted to reflect national teacher and school demographics)

■ Yes
■ No

Ups and Downs

On the rise

■ Headteacher life satisfaction Ever since the pandemic, headteacher wellbeing scores have been on the floor, but we saw an increase this year in their overall life satisfaction – with 62% agreeing they are mostly or completely satisfied compared with just 54% last time.

■ Word-of-mouth jobs In 2021, over a third of you (37%) heard about your most recent teaching role through a newspaper or jobs website, now that's down to 28%. Word-of-mouth is catching on instead.

Heading down

Nothing! Pretty much everything was going in the right direction last week!

Daily Reads

The most read article from the last week has been: Three perspectives

And here are the rest for your reference:

- How one hospital school is trying to help school refusers
- Making better decisions using neuroscience
- Making CPD work better for teachers
- Can using technology enhance the protege effect?
- Tracking participation in lessons!

